PETITIONERS' JOINT REPLY MEMORANDUM OF LAW
ADDRESSING PROCEDURAL FRAMEWORK ISSUES

Pursuant to the Court's Scheduling Order of July 11, 2008, Petitioners hereby respectfully submit this Reply Memorandum in response to the government's memorandum of July 25, 2008.

I. THE APPLICABLE STATUTORY AND DUE PROCESS FRAMEWORK

The government's proposal for a framework to govern these cases ignores both the holding of Boumediene v. Bush, 128 S. Ct. 2229 (2008), and its persistent admonition that habeas remains a flexible, robust procedure designed to provide a meaningful inquiry into the lawfulness of detention by executive decree. Instead, the government proposes a cookie-cutter review process for these diverse cases that rests on two fundamental errors. First, contrary to the government's understanding, as a result of Boumediene's holding that the jurisdictional-stripping provision of § 7 of the Military Commissions Act of 2006 ("MCA") is unconstitutional, the framework for adjudicating these cases is governed by the prevailing habeas corpus statute, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241, et seq. Second, the government misreads the plurality opinion in Hamdi to propose a rigid and inflexible procedure that is at odds with this Court's obligation to seek the truth through a fair and neutral process. The habeas statute, Boumediene, and other controlling habeas precedents establish a flexible, adaptable remedy capable of balancing the competing interests of the parties while ensuring a neutral and robust truth-seeking process in the context of the facts of a particular case. Context-specific procedural questions are not amenable to blanket resolution, but must be addressed on a case-by-case basis.

A. Petitioners' Cases Are Governed by the Habeas Corpus Statute

Contrary to the holding of Boumediene, the government contends that Petitioners are only entitled to the minimum habeas procedures "constitutionally compelled" by the Suspension Clause. This contention is wrong. These cases have always been, and remain, statutory habeas cases brought under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(1) and (3). Although Congress sought to bar statutory jurisdiction through § 7 of the MCA, Boumediene held that § 7 is unconstitutional, and therefore void. Petitioners' habeas petitions were properly filed under 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Now that the constitutionally-invalid provision has been stricken, Petitioners are entitled to proceed with their petitions under the habeas statute that has always been available to them, which necessarily includes those “modern” statutory habeas proceedings of 28 U.S.C. §§ 2243-48 described in Petitioners’ opening brief. The logic of this conclusion can be elaborated as follows:

Rasul held that this Court has jurisdiction in Petitioners’ cases under the habeas corpus statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2241, et. seq. Congress attempted to amend the statute in § 7 of the MCA, which purported to strip the courts of jurisdiction over habeas petitions filed by foreign nationals detained as enemy combatants. Boumediene expressly held that § 7 of the MCA was unconstitutional. 128 S. Ct. at 2274. As a result of Boumediene, the jurisdictional repeal of MCA §7 is simply void, and the habeas corpus statute is as applicable as it was before. See Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 176 (1803) (“[A]n act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void”).

The Court must therefore “disregard” the unconstitutional provision (see Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211, 231 (1995)), and proceed under the pre-existing statutory authority. See United States v. Klein, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 128, 147-48 (1872) (disregarding an unconstitutional statute that divested the court of jurisdiction and reinstating a judgment obtained under prior statutory scheme); accord Armstrong v. United States, 80 U.S. (13 Wall.) 154 (1872) (same); Henry M. Hart, The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts: An Exercise in Dialectic, 66 Harv. L. Rev. 1362, 1387 (1953) (“If the court finds that what is being done is invalid, its duty is simply to declare the jurisdictional limitation invalid also, and then proceed under the general grant of jurisdiction”). See also Boumediene v. Bush, 476 F.3d 981, 1011 (D.C. Cir. 2007) (Rogers, J., dissenting) (stating that the habeas repeal was unconstitutional, and that the proper outcome was to hold that “on remand the district courts shall follow the return and traverse procedures of 28 U.S.C. § 2241, et seq."); Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2266 (stating that “[t]he differences between the DTA and the habeas statute that would govern in MCA §7's absence, 28 U.S.C. § 2241, are likewise telling”) (emphasis added).

This Court's jurisdiction in habeas cases comes from § 2241, not from “constitutional habeas.” As Chief Justice Marshall explained, “the power to award the writ [of habeas corpus] by any of the courts of the United States, must be given by written law.” Ex parte Bollman, 8 U.S. (4 Cranch) 75, 94 (1807). Disregarding the unconstitutional amendment by § 7 of the MCA, that “written law” is § 2241.

The government's suggestion that “Boumediene ‘did not hold’ that constitutional habeas proceedings for wartime status determinations must duplicate statutory proceedings under § 2241 and modern habeas practice,” (Gov't Br. at 6 (quoting 128 S. Ct. at 2267, 2274)), both takes the Court's statement out of context and reveals the depth of the government's confusion. Nothing in Boumediene diminishes the obvious conclusion that the jurisdiction-stripping provision of MCA is void. The Court said only: “Although we do not hold that an adequate substitute must duplicate § 2241 in all respects, it suffices that the Government has not established that the detainees' access to the statutory review provisions [of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005] at issue is an adequate substitute for the writ of habeas corpus. MCA § 7 thus effects an unconstitutional suspension of the writ”. 128 S. Ct. at 2274. The Court was merely explaining that, even though the DTA is unconstitutional, the Court would not specifically catalogue the ways in which a statute would potentially constitute an adequate substitute for the writ. Indeed, the Boumediene Court evinced its understanding that § 2241 would govern as a result of its holding. See, e.g., 128 S. Ct. at 2276 (noting that, following remand, consolidation before a district judge “is a legitimate objective that might be advanced even without an amendment to § 2241”); id. at 2269-70 (considering Hamdi’s analysis of § 2241).

Petitioners are therefore in precisely the same position they were in prior to enactment of § 7 of the MCA, and are in the same position as any other federal habeas petitioner invoking 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Petitioners may proceed, as some of the early petitioners had already been doing in this Court pursuant to Rasul, under the framework established by the habeas statute, to traverse the government’s proffered return to the writ, to undertake discovery where needed, and to have disputed factual questions decided by an evidentiary hearing at which evidence will be taken as prescribed by statute and the Federal Rules of Evidence. See Pet. Br. at 5-7; 28 U.S.C. §§ 2243 and 2246.

B. Hamdi Does Not Compel or Support the Inflexible Procedural Framework Proposed by the Government

In place of the governing habeas statute, the government seeks to impose a narrow and rigid framework that it argues is compelled by the plurality opinion in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004). The government’s proposed framework was not mandated by Hamdi, and would give the government advantages not authorized by statute or permitted by due process, including an undefined presumption in favor of the government’s evidence, a presumption in favor of hearsay, and a prohibition against discovery.

As an initial matter, Hamdi’s suggested procedures relied upon by the government are clear dicta. As dicta, it is in no way controlling, and is rendered all the less persuasive as a result of Justice Souter’s concurrence, refusing to accept the plurality’s suggestion that the government could be entitled to a presumption or that the burden of proof could fall on the petitioner. See 542 U.S. at 553 (Souter, J., concurring) (“It should go without saying that in joining with the plurality to produce a judgment, I do not adopt the plurality’s resolution of constitutional issues that I would not reach. ... I do not mean to imply agreement that the Government could claim an evidentiary presumption casting the burden of rebuttal on Hamdi"). Nothing in Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188 (1977) lends any support to the government's position that dicta in the plurality opinion, much less in Justice Thomas's dissent, is binding precedent when it is specifically disclaimed by the concurring justices. See King v. Palmer, 950 F.2d 771, 781 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (en banc) ("Marks is workable – one opinion can be meaningfully regarded as "narrower" than another – only when one opinion is a logical subset of other, broader opinions"). Indeed, the Supreme Court has already rejected the argument that the Hamdi plurality's suggested procedures are binding precedent. "Setting aside the fact that the relevant language in Hamdi did not garner a majority of the Court, it does not control the matter at hand." Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2269.

In any event, even the Hamdi plurality opinion does not support the government's position. There is no rigid "Hamdi Framework" that can be applied across the board to all "war on terror" habeas cases. Rather, as stated in Judge Traxler's controlling opinion in the Fourth Circuit's recent en banc decision in Al-Marri v. Pucciarelli, Hamdi sets forth one particular fact-based application of a Mathews v. Eldridge due process balancing framework. See Al-Marri v. Pucciarelli, __F.3d __, 2008 WL 2736787, at *31 (4th Cir. July 15, 2008) (Traxler, J., concurring) (noting that the Hamdi plurality does not impose "a cookie-cutter procedure appropriate for every alleged enemy-combatant"). As Boumediene recognized, habeas is an "adaptable remedy. Its precise application and scope changed depending upon the circumstances." 128 S. Ct. at 2267.

The balancing test of Mathews v. Eldridge, as adopted by the Supreme Court in Boumediene and its plurality opinion in Hamdi, requires consideration of "the risk of an erroneous deprivation of [a liberty interest] and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards." Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2268 (quoting Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976)); see also Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 529. As set forth in Petitioners' opening brief, the Petitioners' liberty interests have grown as the years of indefinite detention have worn on, while the government's national security interests with respect to these particular detainees have become weaker and more remote.

It is the government's burden to show – not through generalized and unsupported assertions, but through a specific showing targeted to a particular petitioner's case – that any deviation from the "normal way" is warranted. Al-Marri, 2008 WL 2736787 at *47 (Traxler, J., concurring). Thus, while the Hamdi plurality recognizes that it is appropriate to balance the competing interests of petitioners and the government in adjudicating "enemy combatant" cases, the particular result of the plurality's balancing cannot be directly transposed to these Petitioners.

Although the specific procedures warranted in any one case may differ depending on the circumstances, certain differences between these cases as a group and Hamdi can be identified that suffice to reject the government's blanket approach. First, the risk of misclassifying Hamdi was much lower than in these cases: Hamdi was captured in a "foreign combat zone" with an assault rifle as part of a "Taliban unit," 542 U.S. 512-13, 523; see also id. at 549 (Souter, J., concurring) (Hamdi "was taken bearing arms on the Taliban side of a field of battle"). In contrast, few of these Petitioners were captured on any "battlefield" (an amorphous term for which the government has never proposed a definition). Indeed, according to the Defense Department's own data, only 5% of detainees held in Guantanamo are alleged to have been captured by American forces. See Mark Denbeaux et al., Seton Hall University School of Law, Report on Guantanamo Detainees: A Profile of 517 Detainees through Analysis of Department of Defense Data 2-4 (2006), <http://www.law.shu.edu/aaafinal.pdf>. Or, as Brigadier General Martin Lucenti has explained, “Most of these guys weren’t fighting, they were running.” Mark Huband, US Officer Predicts Guantanamo Releases, Fin. Times, Oct. 5, 2004.

Second, the definition of “enemy combatant” employed by the Court in Hamdi was much narrower and therefore less subject to erroneous application than the definition that the government has since applied in Petitioners’ Combatant Status Review Tribunals (“CSRTs”). In Hamdi, the Court limited the definition to a person who was “part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners in Afghanistan and who engaged in armed conflict against the United States there.” See Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 516. Through the CSRT process, these Petitioners were improperly held subject to a wildly expansive definition of “enemy combatant” purportedly authorizing the detention of a person picked up anywhere in the world, and for mere “support” of forces “hostile to the United States,” even if that support is unintentional. See In re Guantanamo Bay Detainee Cases, 355 F. Supp. 2d 443, 475 (D.D.C. 2005) (noting that under the “enemy combatant” definition employed in Guantanamo, the government claims authority to detain “a little old lady from Switzerland who writes checks to what she thinks” is an Afghan orphanage but is “really a front to finance al Qaeda”). If the government is correct that even unintentional conduct can justify indefinite detention under the laws and Constitution of the United States (a proposition that Petitioners firmly reject), then the “risk of error” in these cases is high, indeed. Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2270; see also Pet. Br. at 12-14. Due process therefore requires more protective procedures than the Hamdi plurality suggested “may” be permitted in certain circumstances.

Despite the government’s attempt to resurrect its favorite controversy regarding application of the Fifth Amendment (Gov’t Br. at 35), it should now be clear that detainees held at Guantanamo have fundamental due process rights. Relying again upon Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U.S. 763 (1950), a case distinguished away once by Rasul and again by Boumediene, the government claims that “Boumediene did not upset the well-established holding that the Fifth Amendment and other individual rights secured by the Constitution do not apply to alien enemy combatants lacking any voluntary connection to the United States.” Gov’t Br. at 9. Thus, the government implies, whatever restricted procedures were available for Hamdi, “must be good enough for an alien.” Gov’t Br. at 6. The government’s premise is incorrect.

As to at least some Petitioners, all doubt has been resolved as to the application of the Fifth Amendment in their cases. Judge Green ruled in the cases previously transferred to her for coordinated consideration that the Petitioners have rights under the Fifth Amendment. See In re Guantanamo Bay Detainee Cases, 355 F. Supp. 2d at 465. The government appealed that ruling, but the applicability of the Fifth Amendment was not addressed on appeal. It is therefore the law of the case in the cases in which it was entered. See Kimberlin v. Quinlan, 199 F.3d 496, 500 (D.C. Cir. 1999) (“the same issue presented a second time in the same case in the same court should lead to the same result”) (quoting LaShawn A. v. Barry, 87 F.3d 1389, 1393 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (en banc)). But even as to the cases that were not before Judge Green, the Supreme Court in Boumediene relied heavily on the line of cases, including the Insular Cases, that applied fundamental rights in territories controlled by the United States. See Boumediene, 128 U.S. at 2254-57, and cases cited therein. See also id. at 2261 (“In every practical sense Guantanamo is not abroad; it is within the constant jurisdiction of the United States”). Detainees in Guantanamo are entitled to fundamental rights, and there is no right more fundamental than the right not to be deprived of liberty without due process of law. See Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 80 (1992); In re Guantanamo Bay Detainee Cases, 355 F. Supp. 2d at 465.

II. THE PROCEDURAL FRAMEWORK

The government's specific proposals related to the procedural issues identified by the Court are all flawed by the fundamental conceptual errors discussed above. Once these conceptual errors are recognized, it is clear that the habeas statute governs in these cases, that the plurality opinion in Hamdi is not controlling and, at any rate, does not set forth a "cookie-cutter approach," and that the government's proposals are not workable. Instead, Petitioners' proposals, set out in detail in their opening brief, are the ones most faithful to the habeas statute and the Court's decision in Boumediene entitling Petitioners to a speedy and just resolution of their habeas cases.

A. Entitlement to an Evidentiary Hearing

As fully described in Petitioner's opening brief, under the habeas statute and the governing case law, an evidentiary hearing is required where the petition, return, and the traverse raise disputed issues of material fact. See 28 U.S.C. § 2243; Pet. Br. at 7-9 (discussing cases).¹ In addition, Boumediene clearly contemplated resolution of factual disputes by evidentiary hearing. The Court would not have ordered that district courts hear and consider new evidence presented by Petitioners, see, e.g., 128 S. Ct. at 2270, if the Court did not contemplate a factual contest between the government's and a Petitioner's case resolved by a full judicial process, including the possible issuance of an order releasing Petitioners based on that judicial disposition. In arguing against the opportunity for any evidentiary hearing, the government makes no mention of this central component of the Boumediene ruling.

¹ Even assuming any relevance of historical practice to these statutory cases, the government's conclusion that evidentiary hearings and live testimony were uncommon at common law is incorrect. See, e.g. Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2268 (citing cases); Ex Parte Bollman, 8 U.S. 75, 125 (1807) (holding five days of factual hearings during which time the Court "fully examined and attentively considered" the relevant evidence and ordered the petitioner released); accord Ex parte Randolph, 20 F. Cas. 242 (C.C.D. Va. 1833); see also Delaware v. Clark, 2 Del. Cas. 578 (Del. Ch. 1820) (live testimony from third parties regarding enlistee's asserted incapacity); R. v. Turlington, 97 Eng. Rep. 741 (K.B. 1761) (discharging woman from custody after reviewing doctor's affidavit and conducting examination of petitioner's mental condition); R. v. Lee, 83 Eng. Rep. 482 (K.B. 1676) (considering petitioner's testimony based on "oath in Court" that "she went in danger of her life by [her husband]" and should be freed from his custody); Brief of Legal Historians as Amici Curiae in Support of Petitioners, Boumediene v. Bush, S. Ct. No. 06-1195; No. 06-1196.

Remarkably, the government takes the skewed position that evidentiary hearings should occur only when the "court determines that, absent an evidentiary hearing, the weight of the evidence supports the habeas petitioner." Gov't Br. at 32.² The provenance of this standard is unclear, other than that such a standard would be highly favorable to the government. Cf. Warden v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 475 (1972) (due process requires reciprocal procedural rights to avoid unfair advantage). In support of its proposal, the government cites to Schrivo v. Landrigan, 127 S. Ct. 1933, 1940 (2007), which is a post-conviction habeas action subject to the procedural limitations imposed by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act ("AEDPA") – a category of cases irrelevant to these proceedings. See Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2264 ("cases discussing implementation of that statute [AEDPA] give little instruction (save perhaps by contrast) for the instant cases, where no trial has been held"). At any rate, the suggestion is both slanted and circular: it appears to require the Petitioner to prove his case (establishing the "weight of the evidence" supports him) before he is entitled to prove his case (through an evidentiary hearing), without imposing any similar burden on the government.

District courts are well equipped to use their discretion in each case to deny an evidentiary hearing if it deems the government's or a Petitioner's allegations to be "vague, conclusory or palpably incredible.” Machibroda v. United States, 386 U.S. 487, 495 (1962).

² The government also argues that Petitioners should be allowed to participate in the hearing only by video conferencing. Effectuation of the Petitioners' right under 28 U.S.C. § 2243 to be present at the hearing unless the petition and return present only issues of law can be addressed according to the circumstances of particular cases. The issue is outside the scope of the briefing required by this Court's Scheduling Order of July 11, 2008, and need not be addressed at this time.

Indeed, there may well be cases in which the government’s evidence is so weak and unsubstantiated that no hearing will be necessary. But an evidentiary hearing is required if, under the circumstances of a particular case, “the petition, the return, and the traverse raise substantial issues of fact.” Walker v. Johnston, 312 U.S. 275, 286 (1941). “If a detainee can present reasonably available evidence demonstrating there is no basis for his continued detention, he must have the opportunity to present this evidence to a habeas corpus court.” Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2273.

B. The Burden of Proof

The government argues that the traditional rule in the post-conviction habeas context is that the Petitioner bears the burden of proving the detention unlawful (Gov’t Br. at 14-15), but, as stated above, the post-conviction context is inapplicable, as it follows a proceeding in which the government has already borne its burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2264. Recognizing that these cases implicate “special circumstances,” however, the government proposes a burden-shifting scheme, including a “presumption in favor of the government’s evidence,” based on inapposite Hamdi plurality dicta (Gov’t Br. at 40 (citing Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 533-34)).³

Consistent with the practice of habeas courts in the executive detention context, as opposed to the post-conviction context, Boumediene specifically stated that the government would bear the burden of establishing the lawfulness of the detention, but left it open for the district courts to decide the “extent of the showing required of the Government in these cases.” 128 S. Ct. at 2271 (emphasis added). As described in detail in Petitioner’s opening brief, three factors support a heightened burden of proof on the government, requiring it to demonstrate the factual sufficiency of its evidence by clear and convincing proof. First, Petitioners are not collaterally attacking a prior judgment by a court of record, but are challenging, in the first instance, the executive’s unilateral decision to detain. “In this context, the need for habeas corpus is more urgent.” Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2269; see also Pet. Br. at 10-11 and n. 3. Second, the extent of the liberty deprivation at stake in these cases is severe – measured in terms of the length of the detention, its indeterminate nature, and its harshness. See Pet. Br. at 11-12. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that for similarly-substantial liberty deprivations, the government has to meet its burden by clear and convincing evidence. Id. (collecting cases). Finally, as numerous government officials and others have concluded, the Guantanamo prison camp has housed, and continues to house, many innocent men. Id. at 13-14; see also Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2270 (detentions in Guantanamo via CSRT process present “considerable risk of error”).

Nothing short of a heightened burden of proof in Petitioners’ cases could meet the writ’s function to guard against arbitrary deprivations of liberty. “Within the Constitution’s separation-of-powers in our constitutional structure, few exercises of judicial power are as legitimate or as necessary as the responsibility to hear challenges to the authority of the Executive to imprison a person.” Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2277.

C. Discovery

1. Discovery is Necessary to Effectuate the Purpose of Habeas Corpus

Contrary to the government's assertion, habeas review is far more than a mere review for legal sufficiency in a proceeding where the petitioner cannot controvert the government's facts (Gov't Br. at 16-17). Habeas is, and always has been, a searching fact-finding endeavor.⁴ Accordingly, factual development, including discovery and the duty to disclose exculpatory evidence, is required. Boumediene reaffirmed the role of discovery as necessary to "preserve the writ and its function." 128 S. Ct. at 2263.

Under the habeas statute, the Court must "summarily hear and determine the facts" and provide the petitioner the opportunity, under oath, to "deny any of the facts set forth in the return or allege any other material facts." 28 U.S.C. § 2243. Section 2246 grants the Court the authority to consider evidence orally or by deposition, and allows a party to "propound written interrogatories" in response to the introduction of testimony by affidavit. See Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286, 296 (1969). As discussed in the Petitioners' opening brief, the Court has the authority to expand discovery beyond what is provided by § 2246 in furtherance of its fact-finding function. See Pet. Br. at 18-22.⁵

Contrary to the government's position that the executive is entitled to discretion to control the information provided to a Petitioner, Harris v. Nelson reaffirms the Court's authority to require that the government produce evidence within its control that bears on the illegality of the detention:

[W]here specific allegations before the court show reason to believe that the petitioner may, if the facts are fully developed, be able to demonstrate that he is confined illegally and is therefore entitled to relief, it is the duty of the court to provide the necessary facilities and procedures for an adequate inquiry. Obviously, in exercising this power, the court may utilize familiar procedures, as appropriate, whether these are found in the civil or criminal rules or elsewhere in the 'usages and principles of law.'

Harris, 394 U.S. at 300. The government cannot arrogate to itself authority that is exclusively within the discretion of the Court. Id. at 300 n. 7 ("[D]istrict courts have the power to require discovery when essential to render a habeas corpus proceeding effective"). Accordingly, when the Court orders discovery, the executive must provide the requested evidence and may not disregard the order as a "matter of Executive discretion" (Gov't Br. at 18).

Nor does Harris conclude that "Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on discovery do not apply to habeas proceedings," (Gov't Br. at 16). To the contrary, Harris provides for discovery mechanisms "in which a district court may, in an appropriate case, arrange for procedures which will allow development, for purposes of the hearing, of the facts relevant to disposition of a habeas petition." 394 U.S. at 298. Thus, while the liberal discovery process under the Rules of Civil Procedure may not be generally applicable in the habeas context, discovery is by no means prohibited, as the government suggests. Harris recognizes that the Court may use the Rules of proceedings for habeas corpus....to the extent that the practice in those proceedings: (A) is not specified in a federal statute, the Rules Governing Section 2254 Cases, or the Rules Governing Section 2255 Cases; and (B) has previously conformed to the practice in civil actions." Fed.R.Civ.P. 81(a)(4); accord Woodford v. Garceau, 538 U.S. 202, 208 (2003) ("The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply in the context of habeas suits to the extent they are not inconsistent with the Habeas Corpus Rules").

Civil Procedure “by analogy to existing rules or otherwise in conformity with judicial usage” to “fashion appropriate modes of procedure.” Id. at 299. In fact, “[w]here their duties require it, this is the inescapable obligation of the courts.” Id.

2. The Government Must Produce Exculpatory Evidence

The government further asserts that the production of exculpatory evidence is a matter of grace, to be provided only if such evidence happens to cross the government attorneys’ desks while they are preparing the return. In support of this extreme proposition, the government suggests that the constitutional obligation of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), applies only to criminal trials. In Boumediene, however, the Court expressly concluded that in these proceedings the Court must have the opportunity “to consider relevant exculpatory evidence that was not introduced during the earlier proceeding.” 128 S. Ct. at 2270.

The government’s duty to locate and to disclose exculpatory evidence is grounded in due process. This constitutional imperative cannot be limited only to exculpatory evidence independently obtained and introduced by the Petitioners, but must include evidence in the government’s possession. In the context of habeas corpus litigation involving a state conviction, the Supreme Court rejected the proposition that “the prosecution can lie and conceal and the prisoner still has the burden to ... discover the evidence,” in “a system constitutionally bound to accord defendants due process.” Banks v. Dretke, 540 U.S. 668, 696 (2004) (citing Bracy v. Gramley, 520 U.S. 899, 909 (1997) (quoting United States v. Chemical Foundation, Inc., 272 U.S. 1, 14-15 (1926) (internal quotation marks omitted))). Concealing exculpatory evidence undermines the government’s role as a seeker of truth. Banks, 540 U.S. at 696 (citing Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281 (1999)). The government should not be rewarded for unwarranted concealment. Banks, 540 U.S. at 696 (citing Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 440 (1995) (“The prudence of the careful prosecutor should not ... be discouraged”)).

The government’s proposal to provide only that exculpatory evidence its attorneys happen upon is fundamentally inconsistent with the government’s responsibilities in an adversary proceeding in which such a serious liberty deprivation is at stake. See, e.g., Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 10 F.3d 338, 353 (6th Cir. 1993) (applying Brady to civil immigration cases where the government seeks denaturalization or extradition based on proof of alleged criminal activities of the party proceeded against). The Supreme Court made clear that willful blindness is not sufficient: “the individual prosecutor has a duty to learn of any favorable evidence known to others acting on the government’s behalf in the case.” Kyles, 514 U.S. at 437. “Because the prosecution is in a unique position to obtain information known to other agents of the government, it may not be excused from disclosing what it does not know but could have learned.” Carriger v. Stewart, 132 F.3d 463, 480 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc); see also United States v. Chapman, __ F.3d __, 2008 WL 1946744, at *10 (9th Cir. May 6, 2008) (holding that reckless failure to disclose exculpatory information as required by the Constitution may constitute flagrant misconduct in violation of due process).

An example of the potential importance of discovery of exculpatory information in these cases occurred several years ago, after the previously classified (now unclassified) interrogation logs of Guantanamo detainee Mohamed al Qahtani were leaked to Time Magazine. The disturbing logs reveal seven weeks’ worth of humiliating treatment, sleep deprivation, and a variety of “enhanced interrogation techniques” during late 2002 and early 2003.⁶ Qahtani subsequently incriminated a number of prisoners at Guantanamo, and his statements constitute a significant portion of the government's factual returns for many of the habeas petitioners. By the Pentagon's own assertion, Qahtani has “[p]rovided detailed information about 30 of Osama Bin Laden's bodyguards who are also held at Guantanamo.”⁷

The factual returns for the habeas petitioners, however, did not include a single reference to the Qahtani interrogation logs, or to the fact that he had named so many of them during his coercive interrogations. The factual returns likewise made no reference to another document, procured by the ACLU pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, in which an FBI deputy director complained to the Pentagon that Qahtani had been held in isolation for months, and that, by November 2002, he was “evidencing behavior consistent with extreme psychological trauma (talking to non-existent people, crouching in a corner of the cell covered with a sheet for hours on end).”⁸ The letter and the interrogation logs, of course, undermine the reliability of any statements made by Qahtani. Counsel for petitioners, however, are privy to this information only by the fortuity of a classified document which was leaked to the press and by the military’s response to a FOIA request made by a non-party. Without the opportunity to take discovery, similar revelatory documents and information would never come to light.

This is by no means a unique example. In the case of detainee Faruq Ali Ahmed, No. 04-cv-1254 (HHK), for example, in a rare statement in Petitioner Ahmed’s unclassified return, his personal representative indicates that a detainee who had made incriminating statements against Petitioner Ahmed was “unreliable” and “has lied about other detainees to receive preferable treatment.” See Brief for Former Federal Judges as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioners,

⁸ Letter from T.J. Harrington, Deputy Director of FBI Counterterrorism Division, to Major General Donald J. Ryder, Department of the Army, July 14, 2004.

Boumediene v. Bush, 128 S. Ct. 2229 (2008) (Nos. 06-1195, 06-1196), 2007 WL 2441585, at *25; Corine Hegland, Guantánamo's Grip, Nat'l Journal, Feb. 3, 2006.⁹ Because the personal representative does not identify who the detainee is or what he has lied about before, Petitioner Ahmed would not be able to challenge the relevance and credibility of this evidence which comprises the bulk of the allegations against him without first receiving appropriate discovery.

D. Hearsay

The government objects that an evidentiary hearing with live witnesses would conflict with this Court's obligation to adjudicate these cases expeditiously and, therefore, argues for unrestricted admission of hearsay. See Gov't Br. at 32. Of course, the fastest way to decide the cases would be to flip a coin. The government's proposal to decide the cases based on hearsay alone amounts to little more than that, because it leaves the Court with little means of weighing one piece of evidence against another. But the clear import of Boumediene is not just that the Court will adjudicate the cases promptly, but that it will seek the truth. See 128 U.S. at 2269 ("The habeas court must have sufficient authority to conduct a meaningful review of both the cause for detention and the Executive's power to detain"). The government's proposal to decide virtually all cases based on hearsay alone is not what the Supreme Court expected for this Court's fulfillment of its truth-seeking role.¹⁰

⁹ Ahmed's personal representative, a lieutenant colonel in the Army, wrote in a partially redacted statement, "I do feel with some certainty that ISN [redacted] has lied about other detainees to receive preferable treatment and to cause them problems while in custody. Had the Tribunal taken this evidence out as unreliable, then the position we have taken is that a teacher of the Koran (to the Taliban's children) is an enemy combatant (partially because he slept under a Taliban roof)."

¹⁰ As noted earlier, some, if not many, of these cases may be decided without the need for discovery or hearings because, as in Parhat, 2008 WL 2576977, the evidentiary support for detention will be deficient on its face.

The government argues repeatedly that this Court should implement a “prudent and incremental” approach to admission of evidence (see Gov’t Br. at 1, 2, 3, 25, 29, 30, 31, and 32), but the approach it suggests involves nothing short of casting out the rulebook and centuries of judicial experience. It would be neither prudent nor incremental to accept hearsay evidence in violation of the Rules of Evidence without at least considering whether a particular declarant is available to testify in person, and without demanding sufficient information to assess the reliability of the hearsay, including the circumstances in which it was obtained. As Judge Traxler explained in Al-Marri, a prudent and incremental approach would entitle a Petitioner “to the normal due process protections available to all within this country, including an opportunity to confront and question witnesses against him,” and alternatives will be considered only on the basis of a government showing of a particular necessity. Al-Marri, 2008 WL 2736787 at *49 (Traxler, J., concurring). The Court “is not handcuffed by an inflexible procedure that would demand acceptance of a hearsay declaration from the government simply because the government has labeled [the petitioner] an enemy combatant.” Id. at *48.

As set forth in Petitioners’ opening brief, the analysis of the admissibility of hearsay must begin with the Federal Rules of Evidence, which are applicable by their terms to habeas corpus cases. Fed R. Evid. 1101(e). The government barely mentions those Rules, and fails to acknowledge their applicability in habeas cases at all. The government also does not discuss the application of the procedures under 28 U.S.C. § 2246, under which the Court has discretion to admit affidavits in habeas corpus cases, but only if the opposing party is given the opportunity to serve interrogatories or obtain an answering affidavit.

Instead, the government rests virtually its entire argument on a single ambiguous line of dicta in the Hamdi plurality opinion stating merely that hearsay “may need to be accepted as the most reliable available evidence" See Gov't Br. at 36 (quoting Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 533-34). From this seemingly innocuous acknowledgment that there are cases in which hearsay can be admitted if it is shown to be necessary and to have a high degree of reliability (see, e.g., Fed. R. Evid. 807), the government seeks to establish the proposition that all hearsay must be admitted, regardless of its reliability. See Gov't Br. at 39 ("Exclusion of hearsay ... would serve no useful purpose").

The government correctly notes that the Hamdi plurality's statement "does not set forth a standard of admissibility" See id. at 36. There was no need for Hamdi to set forth a standard of admissibility. That has already been done in the Federal Rules of Evidence and 28 U.S.C. § 2246. Hearsay is admissible in certain contexts, such as under Fed. R. Evid. 807, which permits use of hearsay with circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness if the requisite elements are present. And affidavits may be accepted in habeas cases in the Court's discretion, so long as the procedures in § 2246 are applied. But the Court should not accept unreliable hearsay, such as statements obtained through use of torture or other coercive techniques, and the Court should not accept hearsay when sufficient information is not provided to evaluate the reliability of the statements and the contexts in which they were obtained. See, e.g., Parhat v. Gates, 2008 WL 2576977, at *12-13 (rejecting use of hearsay lacking indicia of reliability). The Court would abandon its duty to exercise its discretion if it were to allow all hearsay without requiring at least a particularized showing that the declarant is not available to testify and the hearsay statement has circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness.

E. Confrontation of Witnesses

The most effective method of testing the reliability of evidence is cross-examination. As stated above, Petitioners acknowledge that hearsay may be admissible in certain narrow contexts if sufficient circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness are shown to exist. But the baseline assumption, applying a prudent and incremental approach, should be that evidence will be given by witnesses subject to cross-examination. See Al-Marri, 2008 WL 2736787 at *49 (Traxler, J., concurring). A party seeking to admit hearsay should face a heavy burden to show that it is both necessary and reliable. Contrary to the government's assertion, the right to confrontation is not limited to the criminal context. See Pet. Br. at 33-34 (citing cases).

The government disingenuously raises the specter that a rule allowing confrontation of witnesses would allow Petitioners to "haul United States servicemembers away from the battlefield." See Gov't Br. at 33. The government's statement is completely divorced from any actual evidence or event, and it shows exactly why context matters. The Court should not entertain the government's abstract scenario. The sky will not fall if the Court does what courts do every day, which is to decide matters on the law and the facts, not on speculation or innuendo, and to determine along the way whether and which live witnesses will be necessary, and whether they are available, in a specific factual context. As the government well knows, few Petitioners were captured on any battlefield or amidst the "rubble of war." See supra part I.B. Indeed, because only an even smaller fraction of the Petitioners were captured by U.S. forces, it is unlikely that U.S. troops will be burdened in any significant way. See id. Moreover, most Petitioners were taken into custody years ago. It is unlikely that any witnesses with relevant information will be on a battlefield almost seven years later.

In those cases in which hearings are necessary to resolve factual disputes, compelling the attendance of witnesses and confrontation through cross-examination will be necessary in most cases to reduce the "considerable risk of error" that accompanies summary procedures without proper mechanisms to test critical evidence. See Boumediene, 128 S. Ct. at 2270. The government concedes the necessity of evaluating the weight that its hearsay evidence should be given. See Gov't Br. at 39. But it suggests no mechanism for making such an evaluation without the context in which the statements were made – such as inquiry into the declarant's personal knowledge, recollection, opportunity to observe, or motive to lie, including for the purpose of avoiding torture or threats or to curry favor with military authorities. Cross-examination is the means by which evidence is ordinarily evaluated, and one cannot cross-examine an anonymous intelligence report. See, e.g., Parhat, 2008 WL 2576977, at *12-13 (rejecting use of anonymous intelligence reports).

The government notes that “the costs of an erroneous determination against the Government ... are grave.” Gov’t Br. at 40. Clearly, the costs of an erroneous determination against a detainee are at least as grave -- the Petitioners’ prolonged confinement is real, and denial of the habeas petition could mean confinement for the indefinite future. But even taking the government’s concerns at face value, the weighty issues before this Court do not justify a process based upon unreliable evidence. The Court’s role is to ensure a fair process to seek the truth, not to guarantee a result in favor of one party or the other. Indeed, the gravity of the matters before the Court is all the more reason to insist scrupulously that the cases be decided only on reliable, testable evidence. The scope of the constitutional due process right to confront witnesses depends on the facts of individual cases. See Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 786 (1973); Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 478 (1972). A “prudent and incremental” approach cannot permit abandonment of this principle.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, this Court should resist the temptation to establish a rigid, inflexible procedure unconnected to the facts and circumstances of individual cases. The Court should also reject the government's insistence on one-sided rules that strip the Court of its fact-finding tools such as evidentiary hearings, discovery, and cross-examination. Petitioners request this Court to adopt the framework set forth in Petitioners' opening brief, order the government to produce exculpatory evidence, and leave other procedural issues to be decided by individual judges based on the facts of their particular cases.
